Modern relationship between the two countries started in 1950 when India was amongst the first country to recognise the People's Republic China as the legitimate government of Mainland China. Tibet served as a buffer zone between India and China, India regarded the Chinese forceful occupation of Tibet as an act of aggressive while China considered India's posture as an interference in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of China. China did not accept the Mc Mohan line as the legal delineation between India and China, it was a demarcation agreed upon between erstwhile British Raj and Tibet. In 1959 China claimed 104,000km of territory over which India's map were showing clear sovereignty and demanded rectification of the entire border. Unresolved border dispute resulted in a war between India and China on 20 October, 1962 and China pushed the India forces to within 48 Km of the Assam Plains in the northeast and also occupied strategic points in Ladakh, in 1967, there were two skirmishes between Indian and Chinese force in Sikkim, the first was the Nathu La incident and the second was the Chola incident where exchange of heavy fire took place at the Sikkim outpost. In 1987 India granted statehood to Arunachal Pradesh which further caused both the side to deploy new troops to the area, causing tension and fears of new border. China does not accept Arunachal Pradesh as part of China and call it part of South Tibet. The term Line of Actual Control (LAC) gained legal recognition after the Sino-India border agreements signed in 1993 and 1996. The 1996 agreements states that no activity shall overstep the Line of Actual Control. Both the countries have their own interpretation of the delineation of the LAC on the ground as there is no clear demarcation of the boundaries thereby leading to errors of perception and understanding of previous agreement. In 2013 May, the Daulat Beg Odli incident, a three week standoff between India and Chinese troops took place along the Line of Actual Control. The Chumar Incident September 2014, Chumar is an area 300 km northeast of Leh, bordering Himachal Pradesh. China has since long been trying to reduce India's control over that region.
